

The strong and weak

When you recognize that you are not the smartest or the strongest among your peers, you will realize that you cannot do every thing by yourself. However, by recognizing your limitations, you will be able to generate enough sympathy and support from others to help you do something meaningful that makes life rewarding.

On the other hand, when you behave as if you are the smartest and the strongest; you will generate enough envy and resistance to encourage others to oppose you and undermine your efforts to succeed; and thus cause your life to be less satisfying and mostly frustrating.

But when you behave as a humble person, you invite others to treat you with respect and be encouraged to help you succeed in life; yet when you act with arrogance you force them to resent you and deny you the help you need to succeed.

On the other hand, when ignorance and arrogance are combined in one person, they cause his mind to be closed, his heart to loose compassion, and his conscience to go into coma, making failure the only destination to be reached; and hurting others the greatest accomplishment to be achieved.

Mohamed Rabie

www.yazour.com

March 2005