

Ideas and Money

People who have the capacity to create great ideas do not need as much money as people who do not have the capacity to create such ideas. On the other hand, people who have a lot of money do not need to create great ideas as much as those who do not have as much money.

People with ideas are usually able to make money using or selling their ideas and consequently gain public recognition and social status. On the other hand, people with money are usually able to buy new ideas using their money and thus gain public recognition and social status.

People who are able to generate great ideas tend to give generously to others and to causes they believe in and thus derive great deal of satisfaction from sharing their ideas with the people who need them most. In contrast, people with a lot of money but with little or no ideas are less likely to give to social causes. As a consequence, they are unable to derive good deal of satisfaction from whatever money they may give.

Since people appreciate the act of giving and respect the givers, the recognition people of ideas usually get is likely to be genuine and reflect admiration and love. On the other hand, whatever recognition people with money get, it tends to be superficial and lacks admiration and love.

People who are lucky enough to have the capacity to generate great ideas and have substantial amounts of money are truly fortunate; they are able to invest their money and utilize their ideas in ways that enrich their lives and the lives of others.

Mohamed Rabie

www.yazour.com